Writing an argument essay

Many essays that you have to write, whether during your school or college course or in an examination, will require you to present a reasoned argument on a particular issue. This will often be based on your research into the topic, but some questions may ask you to give your opinions. In both cases your argument must be clearly organized and supported with information, evidence and reasons. The language tends to be formal and impersonal.

Paragraph 1—Introduction
 1 Introduces the topic.
 2 States the focus of the essay.

Paragraph 2—Introduces the argument
 The first point (manned missions are not cost effective) with a quote from an expert to give authority.
 1 This is a useful way to introduce a quotation.

Paragraph 3—Development
 Reasons and data are given to support the writer's point of view.

Paragraph 4—Development
 Introduces the second point (unmanned projects are more scientifically productive).

Paragraph 5—Counterargument
 1 Presents the argument: Some may argue suggests that the writer will go on to argue against this position.
 2 Rebutals it. However introduces the argument against 1.

Paragraph 6—Conclusion
 Summarizes the writer's points and states his/her conclusion on the title.
 1 Then introduces the conclusion.
 2 I would argue that clearly shows the writer's position.

Linking words and phrases guide the reader through the argument and show the writer's opinion.

Adverbs can be used to show your opinion.

These phrases make the argument less personal and more objective.

Experts are quoted to support the argument.

“Manned space missions should now be replaced with unmanned missions.” Discuss.
 It is clear that the study of space and the planets is by nature expensive. Scientists and politicians must constantly attempt to balance costs with potential research benefits. A major question to be considered is whether the benefits of manned space flight are worth the costs.
 For Nobel Prize-winning physicist Steven Weinberg the answer is clear. As he noted in 2007 in a lecture at the Space Telescope Science Institute in Baltimore: ‘Human beings don’t serve any useful function in space. They radiate heat, they’re very expensive to keep alive, and unlike robotic missions, they have a natural desire to come back, so that anything involving human beings is enormously expensive.’
 Unmanned missions are much less expensive than manned, having no requirement for airtight compartments, food or life support systems. They are also lighter and therefore require less fuel and launch equipment. According to NASA, the 1992 manned Space Shuttle Endeavour cost $1.7 billion to build and requires approximately $450 million for each launch. In contrast, the entire unmanned Voyager mission from 1977 until 1999, when it departed Neptune, cost only $46.8 million.
 In addition to their relative cost effectiveness, unmanned projects generally yield a much greater volume of data. While manned flights have yet to extend beyond the orbit of Earth’s moon, unmanned missions have explored almost our entire solar system, and have recently observed an Earth-like planet in a nearby solar system. Manned missions would neither be able to travel so far, be away so long, nor collect so much data while at the same time guaranteeing the astronauts’ safe return.
 Some may argue that only manned space flight possesses the ability to inspire and engage the general population, providing much-needed motivation for continued governmental funding and educational interest in mathematics and the sciences. However, media coverage of recent projects such as the Mars Rover, the Titan moon lander, and the Hubble telescope’s photographs of extraterrestrial planets demonstrates that unmanned missions clearly have the ability to attract and hold public interest.
 Thus, taking into account the lower cost, the greater quantity of data and widespread popular support, I would argue that for now, at least, unmanned space missions indisputably yield the most value in terms of public spending.
